The man woke late one morning, he threw off his blankets and got out of bed. He slipped his feet into his slippers and walked across the room to the wash basin. He turned on the cold water tap and splashed the cool water onto his face, then looked in the mirror.

Describe what he saw:

The man turned off the water and went across the room to the window. He pulled back the curtains, threw open the window and breathed in the fresh morning air. The sun was shining and it was a beautiful day as he looked down into the garden.

Describe the house and garden:

Suddenly, to his surprise, in one corner of the garden, the man saw a unicorn and it was eating a lily. He immediately went across the room to the bed and woke up his wife.

Describe his wife:

'Darling', said the man. 'There's a unicorn in the garden eating a Lily.'

'You stupid fool!' She replied. 'There's no such thing as unicorns!'

The man rushed down the stairs and out into the garden, but the unicorn had gone, so he sat down on a log and started to dream.

This is a template to use to get students building up a chain story.

First get them to add the character information and draw a picture of a character.

Then get them to complete the first sentence of the story. They then pass the profile to the next students to get them to add the next line of the story. Each student (or pair of students) adds a line to the story until it gets back to the original creator who is allowed to find out what happened to their character and finish the story

Crowdsourcing Knowledge with Students

Over the last few weeks I have been playing with a very simple brainstorming and voting website called tricider. The great thing about tricider is that it is incredibly quick and simple to use, and yet it enables users to collect information and opinions from all over the web in a very easily digestible and powerful way.

It's very easy to create a tricider topic or question and you don't even need to register, just type your topic or question into the field.

As with most languages, spelling is pretty important in English. It's also something that gives many native speakers problems too, so don't be too worried if you find English spelling difficult and confusing. In this activity you'll be able to practice spelling and your vocabulary in an enjoyable way.

Questioning the Role of Technology in Education

Over the last six months I have been involved in a project with Delta Publishing on their development blog as a guest author to produce a series of postings which question the role of technology and how it is applied in ELT and education in general. This has been a bit of a new departure for me because I usually focus on very practical articles and tend to avoid getting into the sometimes lengthy debates that surround technology with ELT.

I'm now coming to the end of this series for a while and so I thought I would collect together

New students, learning technology and digital literacies

The outcomes indicate the majority of students rate themselves ($n = 617$) as a novice (66.3%), compared to a happy amateur (17.3%), a power user (11.5%), or rather anxious (4.9%). Many observations can be drawn from this, including we tend to have a new intake who have a really good grounding in software (desktop and web based). It also indicates the need to devote resources to a well designed student support package, as 22% are not engaging with web based material would rate themselves as anxious and stressed with respect to technologies in learning.
